As I understand it, mass is equivalent to energy and density in terms of a black hole. So, a black hole should be able to consume mass proportional to its own radius. If this is true, what would be the effects on a black hole if it were able to consume mass proportional to its own radius? For simplicity, let us assume that a black hole has a mass equal to what it had before, but is able to consume mass proportional to its own radius. What would happen? A: The r_s you are talking about is the Schwarzschild radius, the radius at which the black hole would become so small as to be effectively a point. It's really hard to imagine what such a thing would look like to an observer outside the black hole. By their definition, the black hole would be so small as to be effectively a point. If you could cram a supercollider into the black hole, it would just be a point, and the collision would be that there is a point, and a point is a single quantum of matter - even quantum gravity. If you stick an observer inside the black hole, then the black hole is just effectively a tiny point in empty space. You can't actually cram an infinite number of particles inside a black hole because the density of the particles would diverge at the black hole. If you could do so, then at some point the gravitational collapse would create a particle/anti-particle pair - a particle and an anti-particle that were perfectly balanced on the inside. The black hole itself would then be in a state of superposition and
