The pressurized fluid containers have an inner liner, a conduit to enable fluids to flow into and out of the container, and a top that includes an access port for allowing the user to introduce or remove fluids. The pressurized fluid containers also contain a seal that prevents the fluids from leaking from the container or allowing foreign substances to enter the container. A wide variety of devices have been used as seals for pressurized fluid containers. These seals are typically placed inside of the container, in the space between the liner and conduit. The seals have many advantages and disadvantages. The advantages include a low profile for the container, ease of application, and the ability to insert and remove the container from tight places that may otherwise be difficult to access. The disadvantages of the seals are breakage and leakage. The seals that are currently being used typically include a diaphragm portion which is pierced by the liner when the container is filled. The diaphragm then inflates into place to create a seal between the liner and conduit. The most common prior art seals include metal diaphragms and rubber diaphragms. A metal diaphragm is made of an elastic material, such as stainless steel, which is cut and shaped to fit the interior of the container. The pressure of the fluid inside the container forces the metal diaphragm into the liner to form a tight seal.
