I'm considering buying a used car for about $10,000 (not including tax). I live in the Northeast US and am not familiar with the local used car dealerships around my area. My plan is to test drive about 5 cars, talk to a couple of different salesmen, and decide on the best deal. I'd like to know if my strategy will help me find the best car or not. Are used car deals really as bad as they seem? Is it really best to just sit back and watch as the salesman negotiates an offer? A: Make sure you test drive the car and try to make some contacts with the salesman. That is the best advice you can get. In the past, I have had the experience that a salesman is willing to take what the market will bear. I work for the volume dealer; they have an auction to fill their used cars. And, they are willing to over pay to fill the volume they have. At one point in time I was over paying too much for the cars I purchased and I made a process change to negotiate prices down and to be more selective in the cars I bought. I am working on my third consecutive year of buying at the same dealership and I have also lowered my prices (after the second year) and reduced my demand. During the year I got some really good deals. That being said, this dealership is a "bargain" that offers a great experience. They have a great facility that makes it easy to test drive cars (been there several times). They have very experienced salesmen. They don't dick around, and they don't start the negotiation over the price. I was surprised how well they were willing to negotiate, knowing how much I was willing to pay for cars (a decent number of trips to the dealership). All in all, it has worked out very well for me. I am not sure what your time is worth but by going to the dealership, asking questions and using the internet to find prices of the vehicles you have in mind, you can get a good idea of what prices are acceptable and as a good range to work within
