the brothers begin to get nervous about the mouse, and the exterminator is more concerned about being able to get rid of it than about getting the mansion sold. he offers the brothers money to let him trap the mouse, but the brothers refuse, and the exterminator begins to think about how to get rid of the mouse himself. the exterminator talks to a friend who owns a pet store, and gets the idea of selling the mouse to the pet store. even though the film is silly, i found myself entertained. i think it's because it's a little bit like the game of "mouse" on the computer. the mouse is as helpless as it is stupid, and the exterminator, similarly, is baffled by the antics of the mouse. he has no choice but to try to reason with it, and when he does, we laugh. walken is so funny when he's not talking, and even though it's a mechanical mouse, the way it's played by the actors is funny, as is the way it moves. walken is a brilliant actor, but unlike paul giamatti, he isn't believable as a household servant, or even as a workingman. in this movie, he is only funny as an old eccentric who speaks in a voice nobody would believe. he has the right amount of humor and pathos, but not much else. he's like a bug on a pinball machine. he is the most used prop of the film. he is also the film's biggest problem. the exterminator is the only character in the movie who actually believes the truth he tells his clients, and yet he is the only character who doesn't change his behavior to suit the needs of the audience. he even goes so far as to tell the truth to the mouse at the end, but it doesn't matter. even when he does tell the truth, it doesn't matter.

in the course of its adaptation, the screenplay adapts itself to suit walken's peculiar persona. he's always got a peculiar persona, and probably his talent as a clown is just as important as his acting ability. the movie starts with the two brothers, lars and ernie, playing poker, drinking and talking, and spying on the mouse, as lars skilfully realises they can't get rid of her. when the camera pans over the mouse, it shows her, sensibly, hiding in the wall. there are two other things to note: 1) the brothers are never funny and 2) the mouse, although she does sing but that song is really bad. most of the movie takes place in the titular house, where ernie and lars are trying to work out the mouse's plan to be free, and failure. lars's mistress arrives in the house as a surprise party guest. ernie goes to the bathroom to grab his can of "green stuff" and in the bathroom, lars pretends to be his brother to make the mistress use the bathroom and steal the gift in a clear case of a brother-in-law, the tool. the camera pans to the toilet, which, needless to say, the mistress isn't using. when lars asks ernie to get his "green stuff" from the toilet, and ernie does, as he pulls the "green stuff" out of the toilet, the camera reveals that there is no toilet in the bathroom. this is because lars took out a pin and jammed the toilet in front of the toilet in order to fool the mistress into using the bathroom, and it works. the entire situation turns into a hare-brained idea of something that's fun and witty. as far as the movie is concerned, it uses a basic plot setup, the brothers get the mouse-free house by turning the situation around. but what the movie wants to show is how it's done. while it does show how the brothers con the mouse and ultimately manage to catch her, the whole movie is a big exercise in how to be sneaky, how to think ahead and how to overcome the obstacles that you come across in your life. the characters are the reason why this movie works. there is no character development, the characters stay shallow, but that's not a problem, as you need not know any more about them in order to enjoy the movie, which is about the situation, not the characters. sometime later, the youngest of the brothers, lars, has a problem of his own. while the movies' been a bit overlong, it's wrapped up without any problems at the end. this is because the movie has a neat twist at the end that brings everything full circle. my favorite twist is when, after the movie's been over for some time, the younger brother tells the older brother about the twist that makes the two brothers realize that the younger brother actually does have a crush on his wife. it's very clever, and nicely played. it's ironic that this particular brother cannot get the girl, but even at that, he can perfectly play the role of a woman in bed. the other two characters, who are merely plot devices to act out the brothers' schemes, get their jobs done. they win, and finally the house is mouse-free. the movie ends with the two brothers' revenge on their brother-in-law who ruined their plan. 5ec8ef588b
